The Mark 55s were a VERY strong 40hp and would easily hold their own against a modern 40hp, at least on a light hull. They love to run and run fast. Putting a Mark 55 on a big, heavy barge is the kiss of death. Many basic maintenance parts still available, starting at www.oldmercs.com for parts and manuals.

My bet is that if it's not overheating, then it is a fuel issue of some sort. But that's just an educated guess, sitting at my computer. If you plan to dive into this motor, the factory manual is going to be a basic requirement. If the guy before you worked on it without a manual, well, there's is your problem....

Re: Possibly buying a 58 or 59 mercury Mark 55A Forgot to mention to check all the basics before you buy, like: compression, spark, take a look at the carbs, check the wiring under the cowl, and check the lower unit lube and condition of the case. Best is to see it run, or better yet take it for a spin.
